Arthur Ungnad & Hugo Gressmann, Das Gilgamesch-Epos (Göttingen 1911)

- Translator: Arthur Ungnad (1879–1945), "neu übersetzt". Commentary: Hugo Gressmann (1877–1927), "erklärt".
- Series/publisher: Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments 14; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1911.
- URL: https://archive.org/details/dasgilgameschepo00ungn (University of Toronto / Robarts scan, full view). Another copy: archive.org/details/bwb_KV-326-450.
- Retrieved: 2026-10-16
- License / copyright: Public domain (both authors died more than 70 years ago; published 1911).

Files

- `dasgilgameschepo00ungn.pdf`: full volume (21 MB).
- `dasgilgameschepo00ungn_djvu.ocr.txt`: archive.org OCR of the whole volume (Fraktur/Antiqua OCR is decent but imperfect).
- `tablet-XI.ocr.md`: OCR lines 4014–4878 = "Tafel XI" (translation pp. ~52–64, with Ungnad's line numbers and manuscript sigla A, C, D … in the margin, plus footnotes). Uncorrected OCR; check the PDF. Gressmann's commentary on the flood (Sintflut) follows later in the volume and was not extracted.

Line numbering

Ungnad follows Haupt's numbering, which is close to Thompson's (see `../Heidel-1946/README.md` for the offset against George: ~+2 by the dove scene, ~+10 by l. 195).

Assessment

This was the standard German translation before 1930 and is historically important for us: Ungnad's translation (via G. E. Burckhardt's 1916 retelling, which was based on it) is the likely German source of Tchernichovsky's 1924 Hebrew version (Simchoni's introduction names Jensen and Ungnad as the translations). It has old readings: Ninib = Ninurta, Ubara-Tutu, Nisir, "Zyklon" for abūbu, and Ut-napištim. It is philologically obsolete but useful for tracing where Tchernichovsky's wording comes from.