- Note: The restoration [ana-k]u? is proposed in [RN117: 878], who explains thus the meaning of the line: “Gilgameš, wearied by his exertions and perhaps intimidated in the presence of the venerable sage, no longer has the energy or the will to wrestle Ūta-napišti’s secret out of him, and holds back from violence.” Differently, [RN602: 418] understands: “mein Arm ist untätig gegen dich”; while [NABU2003-71], who restores [e-nin-n]a, understands the phrase literally as “[Maintenant] mon bras est posé sur ton dos,” i.e., “[(et) maintenant] j’embrasse tes épaules.”
- Note: [RN602: 418] states that the writing n]a-da#-at-ta must reflect nadâta, i.e. a second person. For a different view, see [RN117: 878].

In the OB poem the preposition is in any case clearly ki#-ma (CT 46 3 i 29). The obvious derivation of ṣullulu as a denominative verb from ṣulūlu, ‘roof’, remains a much better idea. - Note: See [RN117: 886]: “It is customary to take *{d*iš-tar} as a proper noun. However, the following line, which develops the idea further, shows that the mother goddess is the subject here. Though Ištar and Bēlet-ilī can be identified in the more syncretistic theological traditions (CT 25 30, 12), they are normally quite separate deities. Ištar is quite out of place as the lamenting goddess on this occasion. The parallel passage of OB Atram-ḫasīs has a similar couplet with il-tum in the first line and *{d*ma-mi} in the second (III iii 32-3); thus I take *{d*iš-tar} as a common noun, anticipating bēlet-ilī (cf. Bottero,₂ p. 191, fn. 2; for another example in SB Gilgameš see SB I 274, where {d}ištari ummīšu, ‘the goddess, his mother’, is Ninsun). The word ištaru, feminine and singular, provides a stark contrast with ilū, masculine and plural, in the previous line. The compassionate reaction of the individual most affected by the disaster is set against the selfish reaction of the crowd. The mother goddess initiates the lamentation for, as she will herself emphasize, it is her offspring who have been destroyed. The phrase kīma ālitti provides an advance clue to the goddess’s identity, for Bēlet-ilī is the archetypal female in childbirth. MS [NinNA2]’s ma-li-ti is ostensibly a different word, but since this is a root primae-w it cannot be excluded that it is an orthographic variant only, akin to mar-šu-ti for aršūti in SB VI 3.”

- Note: See [RN117: 888]: "Once it is seen that the metrical balance of ll. 132–3 would be better served if the line division came after tâmtu (note the perfect chiasmus that results in the rest of l. 133), it becomes clear that all three manuscripts preserve a false division of lines. Accordingly, the relative clause of l. 132 and its simile kīma ḫayyālti describe the sea in l. 133 (so already CAD M/1, p. 82, Hecker), not the Deluge of l. 131." The division is considered "unwahrscheinlich" by [RN602: 420], who understands that the relative sentence refers to qabla in the previous line: "die Schlacht, die um sich geschlagen hatte." On the line, see also [RN1780: 135]: "There is a cycle of magical spells to aid a woman in travail which share the image that the unborn child within the amniotic fluid is a boat in a stormy sea, moored in the darkness to the 'quay of death' by the umbilical cord and unable to break free to be washed out into the world. The round, nutshell Ark containing the whole seed of life, tossed on the waters before reaching anchorage, is undoubtedly likened to a storm-battered foetus, albeit obliquely; the voyage to eventual safety is re-enacted each time a baby is born."

- Note: See [RN117: 889]: “In the matter of the number I have given precedence once again to the reading of the more reliable MS [NinNA4] over that of MS [NinNA2]. Most translators prefer ‘twelve’ and assume that this figure is a measure of length and that a metrological unit must be understood. However, this does not account for the distributive determinative, and I am more sympathetic to Oppenheim’s idea that the reference is to direction rather than distance ([RN729: 54]: ‘in each (of the) 14 directions’). The use of nagû evokes the famous world ‘map’ (‘diagram’ would be the more accurate term), in which areas of land depicted as beyond the Bitter Sea, at the edge of the world, are so termed (CT 22 48). Ūta-napišti sees a similar view, an expanse of water relieved at intervals by distant islands (the evidence for nagû with reference to islands is collected by W Horowitz in his discussion of the map, [RN503: 30–2]). Oppenheim took the figure fourteen as significant: ‘instead of the seven nagû-mountains depicted on the well-known Babylonian mappa mundi, we have here double the amount (the variant “12” of one copy is to be emendated)”, and he referred for confirmation to H. and J. Lewy’s ‘seven-direction-system’ ([temp_id_3518708183247119: 8–13]). However, it is by no means certain that the map, when complete, showed seven such islands: some commentators presume eight to be more likely ([RN409: 60]; Horowitz, loc. cit.).” Compare also the translation suggested by [RN602: 420]: “in je 14 (Meilen Entfernung) stieg Land herauf,” i.e., “Uta-napišti steht auf dem Schiff und erblickt ringsum in einiger Entfernung Land.”

There is also the verb i-pi-ra-ni in broken context in SB III 42 to consider. The winds, which symbolize the four corners of the earth, are thus not the directions in which the boat’s cargo disperses but those in which the sacrifices are made (so also Lieberman and CAD N/1, p. 339, though otherwise Š/2, p. 136).” See also [RN602: 420–421], who believes, with most previous interpreters, that the direct object of ušēṣī-ma are “die Bootsinsassen (...), die sich in alle vier Winde zerstreuen: ‘Ich ließ (sie) aussteigen ...!”

- Note: [RN117: 890–891]: “These two lines explain in detail how Ūta-napišti made the first ritual offering of food to the gods and therefore elaborate on the phrase surqinna šakānu in l. 158. The word uktīn can be parsed as II/1 perfect but perhaps also as II/3 preterite, not iterative but serial, with the nuance of setting in rows or one by one (see *GAG*³ §91f). The objects set up in this manner, called adagurru (or atakurru), are small vessels that contain liquid for rituals of libation. Around their bases Ūta-napišti puts perfumed leaves and resin. It has been suggested that these were thrown on to fire beneath the vessels (CAD A/1, p. 93), but this does not tally with what we know of the function of the adagurru. This container is nowhere directly associated with fire and we do not expect libations to be warm. It remains true that the aromatics’ function in such rituals was to attract the gods’ attention to their meal, and that to that end they were usually burnt on a censer. This understanding informs the ritual quoted in the preceding paragraph and is expressed directly in an incantation prayer to Girra, the fire god (LKA 139, 49): [ilū{m]eš e-ri-ša-am ul uṣ-ṣi-nu ba#-lu-uk-ka}, ‘without you [the gods] cannot smell the aroma’. Perhaps aromatic leaves and gum were on some occasions thought pungent enough nevertheless to reach the gods’ nostrils without being burnt as incense. Further study is required of the various ways in which the gods of Babylonia could be fed.”

- Note: See [RN117: 891]: “The couplet’s syntax has caused difficulties (the most recent exegesis is by [NABU1998-30]). It is best understood in the light of the parallel OB Atram-ḫasīs III vi 2-4, where a nominal clause modified with precative lū is followed by a clause with the voluntative luḫsus: zu-ub-bu-u₂ a[n-nu-tum] lu-u₂ uq-ni ki-sa-di-i[a-a-ma] | lu-uh-su₂-us₂-ma u₄-mi [an-nu-tim] zi-[...], ‘these flies [shall be] the lapis lazuli (beads) around my neck, so that I remember [these] days [...]’ (cf. W. von Soden, TUAT III/4, p. 643). (...) The uncertainty of the sources regarding the verb of the second line has led previous commentators to read aḫsusamma, with or without lū, but neither form makes sense (lū with the preterite denotes retrospective wish, ‘I should have ...’, or reports past fact, ‘I did ...’). Reference to the OB text encourages me instead to read MS [NinNA1] as lu-u₂-uh-su-sa-am-ma, an orthography comparable with the same tablet’s lu-u₂-up-te in SB XI 281 (note also lu#-u#-uš-pu-uk in SBVI 30, Kuyunjik MS). The other manuscripts’ aḫsusamma is corrupt.”

- Note: See [RN117: 891]: “As Lambert remarked in his note on the parallel couplet of Atram-ḫasīs (OB III vi 9-10), the older text’s a-ia-a-nu indicates that MS [AššNA1] (which is better restored [a-a-n]u- than Borger’s [man]-nu-, [RN52aa: 110]) has the better tradition of reading in this line, since it avoids the conflict of gender between ayyumma and napištu. The same manuscript also confirms that ll. 175-6 are a couplet, not a single line.” On the version of the line in OB Atramḫasīs, see [NABU2017-43: 43].

Further research is needed to discover whether the negation of past lū ibluṭ, 'would that he had survived', can really be ay ibluṭ and not, as expected, lū lā ibluṭ (cf. in form positive and negative wish with the stative, lū damqat : lū lā damqat)." - Note: See [RN117: 891–892]: “cf. OB Atram-ḫasīs III vi 24: [...] u_3 ru-um-mi. In trying to make this line fit the specific context of the punishment of sinful mankind, most translators have followed the spirit of A. L. Oppenheim’s rendering: ‘but be careful lest (an innocent) might be punished, act gently that an(other) might not [come to harm]!’ ([RN729: 55, with fn. 2]: ‘the verbs ramû II and šadādu have here the nuance ‘to go slow, to let loose’). I can find no support for this. While šadādu can be ‘to heed’, even without ina/ana libbi (as in SB XII 32) and rummû can be ‘to relax’ (trans.), so far from being synonyms they are more commonly antonyms, ‘to pull taut’ and ‘to slacken, loosen’; and ay ibbatiq has nothing to do with punishment. Heidel translates more accurately (‘let loose, that he shall not be cut off; pull tight, that he might not ge[t (too) loose]’, but still identifies the anonymous third person singular with ‘man’. I do not find this convincing. In my view the line is proverbial, using the imagery of hauling a boat upstream (šadādu is the usual verb for this work). The point is that the appropriate amount of force must be applied: too much, and the rope will snap under the boat’s inertia; too little, and momentum will be lost as the line goes slack. Enlil’s retribution has been out of all proportion to what was required, and Ea goes on to list the less dire means that are suitable for the reduction of human numbers.”

The Deluge is certainly past (taškunu) but this does not allow us to ignore the grammar and force the alternative means of reducing the population into the past also. Ea uses the precative because the alternatives remain at Enlil’s disposal and should be used in future.” But compare [RN602: 421]: “Es ist deshalb von Soden und Hecker zuzustimmen, daß sich diese Aussage auf eine erneute, künftige Flut beziehen muß, und das Präteritum taškunu folglich die Vorzeitigkeit in der Zukunft ausdrückt: “anstatt daß du eine Flut gemacht haben wirst” = “anstatt daß du eine Flut machen wirst”.”

- Note: See [RN117: 893]: “It is conventional to derive muš-šu-kat₃ from mussuku,which means ‘to be ugly, foul, vile’. According to the attestations of this verb and associated words in the dictionaries, this root never uses /š/ as its middle radical. Semantically it is not obviously appropriate. Its most common use is of tarnished reputation and it is not found with foodstuffs. Bread in any case does not putrefy in the open: it goes mouldy and hard. Thus I feel emboldened to posit as a denominative verb muššuku ‘to turn (something) into leather’, for bread, particularly Mesopotamian bread, goes leathery as it dries out. (It is only proper to note that long after reaching this conclusion I found that the translation of muššukat as ‘leathery’ already occurs in [gardner_gilgamesh._1985: 241 and 245].)

- Note: [RN117: 894]: "(...) I compare the idiom with Maqlû III 70: e-te-lil ki-ma nam-ru. There is no class of priest known as namru and the phrase seems to mean 'I have become as pure as pure can be'. The commentary on this line offers the explanation nam-ru= {*d*ša$_2$-maš}, 'pure = sun' (KAR 94, 44), but this explanation is not convincing and probably represents a late scholar's ad hoc rendering of an old idiom that had perhaps fallen out of use. Previous commentators have failed to notice that Sumerian possesses a similar construction, as seen in the stock phrase hul$_2$.la.gim im.ma.na.ni.ib.gar in Gudea's hymn on cylinders (Cyl.A xiv 5-6, xvii 28, xx 4, 12), translated as 'it made him extremely happy', in my view correctly, by D. O. Edzard, RIME 3/I, pp. 77–81. In a building inscription of Samsuiluna the same Sumerian phrase relates the pleasure felt by Šamaš at the destiny Enlil has decreed for Sippar. An Akkadian translation is extant: ki-ma hi-du-tim it-ta-aš-ka-an-šum (Frayne, RIME 4, p. 376, 23–4//31–2). This looks very much like a mechanical rendering of a construction that was not properly understood. I conclude that both languages, Akkadian and Sumerian, can express the superlative by construing an adjective with kīma // gim" (see also [RN7871: 231–232]). [RN602: 422] considers this interpretation "gewagt" and translates instead "Sein Filzhaar wasche er mit Wasser wie ein (kultisch) Reiner" (following CAD E 106a). Note, however, that constructions of kī + Substantive or Adjective are known since the Middle Babylonian period ([RN27201: §114f]; [RN2787: 202]; [jimenez2022middle: 86]), and that this meaning would fit the context: "let him wash his matted hair clean."

- Note: [RN117: 895]: “There is a lack of agreement in the dictionaries as to the exact identification of the plant amurdinnu: CAD proposes ‘bramble’, AHw suggests ‘Rose?’. I. Diakonoff compared the description of the plant given here with the mention of its fragrance in the episode of the snake (now l. 305), and wrote: ‘no wonder that all commentators, from George Smith to the AHw, have always thought the magic plant was or looked like a rose, with its prickles and its magic odour’ ([diakonoff1980thorns: 20]). He goes on to show that the plant amurdinnu was known as an aromatic and argues that it is more likely the wild rose, Rosa canina, than a bramble. This I accept, but one should stress that it is not the scent of the amurdinnu that is the issue in the imagery of this couplet. Only its thorniness is important. The fact that the magic plant described by Ūta-napišti, and in due course recovered by Gilgameš, also had a strong scent –appealing to snakes in particular– would appear to be coincidence, even if it led earlier commentators to the right conclusion. Nothing need be held in common by the amurdinnu and the magic plant except their thorns.”

The second part of what is thus a couplet is usually restored along the lines of ‘you will find life’ or ‘you will become young again’. This line is effectively the precursor of SB XI 296, in which Gilgameš reports the plant’s rejuvenating effect to Ur-Šanabi. - Note: [RN117: 895–896]: “The meaning of the phrase šam-mu ni-kit-ti has been something of a crux. Many have analysed the second word as niqittu, a medical term for the most critical or life-threatening phase of a disease or condition (e.g. [LS304: 233]: ‘die Pflanze gegen Unruhe’; Kovacs: ‘a plant against decay(?)’; Dalley: ‘a plant to cure a crisis’). A plant so named could therefore be viewed as a herb reserved for use on someone in grave danger of dying, the ‘plant of death’s door’. Others have opted for slightly different interpretations of the same word (Labat: ‘un remède contre l’angoisse’; Bottéro: ‘la plante specifique de la peur(-de-la-mort),; Petrinato: ‘la pianta dell’irrequietezza’, i.e. of youthful vigour). In discussing this problem K. Watanabe has since compared the name of the plant with a passage in a NA lener which reads a-ke-e la-ab-laṭ a-li ni-kit-ti da-me-e-a ina lib₃-bi-ia e-tab-lu, ‘How can I survive? Where is my n.? The blood has dried from my heart’ (ABL 455, 12-14 [= SAA 15, 30]), and concludes, undoubtedly correctly, ‘demnach wäre niqittu/nikittu “Herzschlag, pulsierendes Leben”’ ([watanabe1994lebenspendende: 583, fn. 6]). I read nikittu and not niqittu because, in Gilgameš, the associated verb, meaning ‘to beat’ (of the heart), is nakādu (SB VIII 58). The plant is thus one which ensures that fundamental sign of life, the healthy heartbeat of youth and the strong pulse that accompanies it.” On the plant’s name, see also [north2013gilgamesh: 214].

- Note: See [RN117: 896–897]: “The identity of the ‘Lion of the Earth’ has recently been discussed by [sjoeberg1984eve: 221–2]. He traces the phrase back to Ebla (na-iš gar₃-ga-ri-im), and, more revealingly, notes the semantic equation between nēš(u ša) qaqqari and Greek χαμαιλέων, both meaning ‘earth-lion’, and also the long-known equation entered in the pharmaceutical series Uruanna III, nēš(ur.maḫ) qaq-qa-ri = ḫu-la-m[e-šú], which is itself commonly rendered chameleon (MSL VIII/2, p. 58). Sjöberg thus proposes that the animal that makes off with Gilgames’s plant could have been a chameleon and that ‘either “earth-lion” (nēšu ša qaqqari) was interpreted as an epithet of the snake or ṣēru might have been the more general “reptile”’. Since underhand behaviour of the kind Gilgames encounters here is universally the mark of snakes rather than lizards, I am inclined to keep nēšu ša qaqqari in our line separate from nēš qaqqari the chameleon. The ‘Lion of the Earth’ is an epithet well suited to the snake, which when alarmed is a threat every bit as dangerous to human beings as the more obviously threatening four-legged version. In ancient Mesopotamia lions and snakes were more of a kind than one might think, for they held an equal terror for the Babylonian traveller. According to the common omen apodoses šiḫiṭ nēši and šiḫiṭ ṣēri, ‘attack by lion’ and ‘attack by snake’, the two most feared encounters in the open were with exactly these two animals, and these alone: according to the dictionaries no other animal appears in this phrase in such texts (AHw, p. 1209; CAD Š/2, p. 416). For MS [NinNA1]’s spelling of first person ītepuš with initial i- see SB XI 82 and commentary.” On the epithet, see also [RN7871: 232].

- Note: See [RN117: 897]: “For ana 20 bēr as signifying ‘a long way’ see also SB VII 41 and commentary. With the rest of the line compare Sennacherib’s description of the incoming tide (III R 12 no. 2, 28, ed. Luckenbill, OIP 2, p. 74, 74: e-du-u₂ ta-ma-ti gap-šiš [iš]-ša₂-am-ma, ‘the tide of the sea rose against me in a great swell’). The verb našû is here intransitive. Diakonoff has a very different understanding of this and the following lines: “… at twenty leagues distance the tide rocks the flower [ināš šamma], | When I opened the well I lost my tools, | Something I’ve found that to me is a sign: it’s my fate to renounce it [luḫḫis], | And even the boat I’ve left on the shore.” ([diakonoff1980thorns: 19]). Quite apart from the fact that nâšu is intransitive, his reading edit edû ināš šamma is now precluded by the new variant inaššâ edû (Assyrian MS [KalNA1]).”

- Note: See [RN117: 897 ad 317–318]: “Most take the final clause of l. 317 as an avowal of future intentions –the abandonment of the quest– with the mention of leaving the boat tacked on as a curious afterthought (e.g. Diakonoff, quoted above). Metrical as well as semantic considerations suggest that there is something wrong with the text: if the afterthought is an unsatisfactory anticlimax, the lines are unevenly balanced. Bottéro solved these problems by placing anāku lū aḫḫis after l. 318, which then yields "J’ai laissé la barque au rivage / Et j’(en) suis (trop) loin’" ([RN39Bot: 204]). For me the couplet reads just as well, and acquires metrical balance, with the words left in the order that has come down to us but with a different line division, so that anāku lū aḫḫis introduces l. 318 rather than concluding l. 317. It is then a lament that Gilgameš did not leave the boat on the shore and turn back (cf. CAD N/1, p. 128; Reclam²). This must be a reference to the initial crossing of the ocean, to which, significantly, the alternative was ‘coming away’, using the same word as here (SB X 91: iḫis). The point is that if Gilgameš had never reached Ūta-napišti he would not have suffered the successive failures that so demoralize him. How much better had he given up his quest when he first reached the ocean, just as the wise Šiduri had advised him.”
