- Note: See [RN117: 862]: "The trace after a-na is not certainly DI[NGIR], either here or in the apparent parallel l. 25, but the indirect object of illikū suppû'a is very likely a deity. The plural imperative šullimā'inni in l. 12 presupposes that more than one deity was invoked, and thus rules out a repetition of {d}sîn from l. 10. As the most prominent of the astral deities, Venus is perhaps the foremost candidate for restoration here, but this is uncertain while the trace before šullimā'inni in l. 12 is undeciphered. (...) If it is right to restore a divine name following ana, there is not room enough in the break also to accommodate the standard epithet šākin(at) namirti (used of both Sîn and Šamaš, and also the fire god: see CAD N/1, p. 229). As a provisional solution I propose simply DN namirti."

- Note: See [RN117: 862]: “In l. 16 the break does not seem to be wide enough to accommodate namṣara ina, which is the phrasing expected from the only versions of this line that survives unbroken (OB Ishchali, Nergal and Ereskigal), and the big area of blank clay before šibbīšu suggests that there was no preposition on this occasion. - Note: See [RN117: 863]: “The spelling še-mu for šumu was understood by von Soden as standing for šᵉmu (AHw, pp. 1274–5). However, according to I.J. Gelb šumu derives from older šimum* (BiOr 12 (1955), p.105; cf. Hebrew šēm), so this orthography might instead derive from an archaic or dialectal variant of the word. (…) Perhaps, in the end, the text will turn out to be corrupt (read <<ŠE>> šum₃-su₂). However that may be, the singular possessive suffix here and in l. 42 (bābšu, unless the referent there is the sun) is at first glance difficult to reconcile with the plural possessive suffixes in ll. 40-1 (elūšunu, irassunu). The solution proposed is that the Twin Mountains were indeed two mountains, one in the west and one in the east (such is the clear implication of l. 45). The singular pronouns refer to the mountain Gilgameš has reached, the plural to the mountains as a pair. (…)”
