However, there must remain a certain reluctance to restore banû here, since the wild animals did not themselves bring Enkidu into the world but only reared him. It may be significant that in the Kuyunjik manuscript the preserved trace will not allow ib-nu]-u₂#-ka; ib-nu-ni]k-ka is possible, if less likely. Some other verb is suspected.”

In any case, in the present context ay itūr, ‘may it not go back’, is semantically difficult. Gurney suggested a-a i-qu!-la, ‘may they not fall silent’, and this is generally accepted by recent translators; alternatively one might propose a-a i-BANDA$_3$-la < ay ibbaṭlā, ‘may they not cease’. The problem with both proposals is that, while the sign la gives the 3rd fem. pl. ending required if we take KASKAL{meš} at face value, the trace on the more reliable Kuyunjik manuscript still will not agree: it is of a sign like u]r, k]a or ša]r. The first of these suggests a-a i-tu-u]r again, the second perhaps a-a ip-par-k]a or la na-par-k]a (cf. the defective writing in CT 16 20, 67), synonymous with ay ibbaṭlā.”

- Note: See [RN117: 854]: “The spareness of the language means that the line is ambiguous. The passage is usually understood to refer to libations of water made to the Euphrates as a numen loci or on its bank. The Hittite paraphrase reports that Gilgameš and Enkidu made offerings to the sun god on the banks of the Euphrates but says nothing of where the water came from ([RN314: 108-9]). The present line must be connected with the repeated digging of wells during the journey to the Cedar Forest (SB IV 5 // 38 // 83 // 125 // 166). Accordingto the Yale tablet, some of the water so acquired had to be poured out in libation to Šamaš and Lugalbanda (OB III 268-71). It seems to me that the present line makes the point that the libations comprised water from the Euphrates itself. Travellers from Babylonia to Lebanon had to follow the Euphrates upstream for much of the way, and wells dug in its vicinity could easily be imagined to contain water from the river.”

- Note: See [RN117: 854]: “This is the first of two couplets dealing with people who provided Enkidu with, among other things, dairy products. There are difficulties in the Kuyunjik text. It is not clear why a herdsman should have brought ḫīqu, if this is a diluted beer. However, my suspicion is that ḫīqu might be any diluted liquid (cf. ḫâqu, ‘to mix with water’), and thus sometimes a dairy product like the Turkish ayran.”

Recent translators follow Gurney in taking tap-pa-šiš as 2nd masc. sg. reflexive; however, although according to the Pennsylvania tablet Enkidu did indeed anoint himself with oil when he left the wild (OB II 108: šamnam iptašašma awīliš īwe), the structural parallel would then be lost. My translation assumes that tap-pa-šiš is the Sultantepe scribe’s orthography for the active tupaššišu, with 3rd fem. sg. prefix under Assyrian influence.”

- Note: See [RN117: 859–860]: “The beginning of this line is very lightly written, suggesting that, as becomes clear in ll. 168-73a, where the beginnings of some lines are left blank, the scribe was dealing with a broken original. The verb ih-NINDA₂-ma should thus be treated with some scepticism; perhaps it is intended for iḫ-ḫáš-ma, yielding ay iḫāš libbašu ay immaraṣ, ‘he should not be anxious nor sick at heart’. The line recurs as SB VIII 174 in MS m. As noted by [RN24: 43], it is reminiscent of a standard Sumerian poetic line, ur₅ nam.ba.e.ug₇ ša₃ nam.ba.e.sag₃.ge, which occurs in the Death of Bilgames and other texts as a stock line describing the despair of an individual faced with imminent death.”

- Note: See [RN117: 862]: "This couplet follows the same pattern as SB I 99-100, where the mother goddess fashions Anu's zikru ('word, idea') 'in her heart' (ina libbīša), with the result that Enkidu is created. While na-a-ri in l. 212 could be 'singer' rather than 'river', it does not seem likely that a minstrel has been singing, and all recent translators opt for 'river'. The river is presumed to be the Ḫubur, the Babylonian Styx. What the 'word/idea' of this river might be is unknown. Instead I follow the suggestion of A. Cavigneaux that this line is related to the passage of the Death of Bilgames in which the Euphrates is diverted by damming while the hero's tomb is built in its bed ([RN24: 11]). The spelling ZIK-ru is thus for sikru or sekēru, so written because it was misunderstood under the influence of SB I 100."
